The series responds to an increasing awareness among scholars of the ancient Mediterranean world that phenomena of culture, religion, and politics cannot be isolated, but must instead be studied in relation to each other. Moreover, since the work of the History of Religions School, it is clear that such phenomena cross boundaries of languages, countries, and religions. To render a truly fruitful examination of Greek literature in the Imperial period, the time has come to acknowledge its deep entanglement in Roman politics and to investigate parallels in contemporaneous religious texts. Likewise, for fresh insights to be gleaned, readings of early Jewish or Christian texts ought to take into account relevant discourses in pagan literature, philosophy and religion.

The new series, launched by an international team of experts with a strong interdisciplinary orientation, provides the necessary platform for such pioneering research. It is one where equal status will be granted to the different religions and fields of discourse. Both Jewish and Christian texts as well as those dealing with Greek and Roman religion and philosophy will share the same standing, with culture, politics, and religion alike meeting on level ground. The series also welcomes studies on other religions and their connections in the Greco-Roman world. Each volume in the series will strike its own balance between these different factors. Both monographs and collections of essays are welcome.
