International megatrends such as globalization and digitalization have resulted in companies coming more and more regularly into contact with foreign legal systems, law enforcement mechanisms and judicial processes. This was the subject of the Sixth Bitburger Discussions held in Munich last December. The conference's main focus was a comparison of German, continental European and American laws with special emphasis on private law enforcement. The second round of discussion compared the advantages and disadvantages of private arbitration on the one hand with the pros and cons of state jurisdiction on the other.

In this volume, the authors focus on the controversial issue of whether the European fiscal union would be the solution for the current European Union crises that were caused by crises on the financial market but are presumably due to other, more deeply rooted causes. Will it be possible for the European Monetary Union to proceed according to its current concept, maintaining the sovereignty of each Member State without establishing a cross-governmental financial Member States' control that manages and imposes sanctions with regard to the adherence to regulations? Or will it be necessary to establish a fiscal union for a stable maintenance of order? Would this concept be feasible from a political, institutional and economic standpoint?
