How can the EU courts exercise judicial review without seeking expert evidence when the European Commission's criteria for decision-making are primarily of an economic nature? Taking the example of the ban on state aid, Gustav Ollinger reveals that the courts have developed an independent procedural concept of judicial review for the commission's margin of appreciation in complex economic assessments.

In German administrative hearings, secret in-camera-proceedings are used to resolve the conflict between what has to remain confidential and what can be disclosed in the public interest. Anton Troßbach compares this handling of matters to England's system of judicial review, and makes the case for a revision of German proceedings based on legal transplants.

Drawing parallels with other subjects in cross-institutional administration, she proposes a modification of the federal government's supervisory instruments.

Traub, Sebastian

Nebenbestimmungsfeindliche Verwaltungsakte

Are there administrative acts that must not be subjected to conditions or other ancillary clauses? Although this is broadly approved of in German jurisprudence in many instances, Sebastian Traub reveals that there are numerous blurred areas and cracks in the theory. By refocussing away from traditional categories, he develops a new and sharper approach that makes way for significantly more flexible forms of autonomy in the administrative decision-making process.
