

Future Concepts of Law

Edited by Dan Wielsch

The 2020-founded series Future Concepts of Law (FCL) documents the work of leading academics and practitioners that maps out the legal issues tomorrow's society will face. By following lines of development already recognisable today, the authors roll their theses into the near future and offer them up for discussion. On the one hand, new social and technological dynamics of change will be considered, while on the other, proposals about which direction further development of legal categories should take in order to provide the political community with fitting solutions to problems will also be made.

Media shapes society at least as fundamentally as vice versa. In the network society, virtually all concepts of media law are currently being challenged. Karl-Heinz Ladeur's keynote contribution is followed by commentaries from Albert Ingold and Christoph Beat Graber that seek to imagine the future of the media constitution.

How to envision future concepts of law? This new series tries to imagine the challenges of tomorrow's society and possible developments in different legal fields. In the first volume, Dieter Grimm (keynote) and Anne Peters (commentary) contemplate the achievements of fundamental rights and extrapolate their function beyond the state.
