RDGG is an international book series devoted to the understanding of the complex religious, cultural, and social dynamics within the world religions (particularly Judaism, Christianity and Islam) as well as between those religions and between religious traditions and secular spheres of society.

The series brings together interdisciplinary – theological, philosophical, historical, cultural, cultural anthropological, and sociological – studies on the multi-faceted, dynamic interplay between religious entanglements, cultural translations, and processes of cultural exchange. Theoretical works regarding concepts of religious diversity, difference, and dialogism are most welcome.

The series will include monographs from senior scholars and excellent early career researchers, innovative conference proceedings and collected volumes as well as anthologies of sources. The languages will be German and English. Manuscripts will be accepted based on a peer-review process in which external reviewers will be consulted.

Please send manuscripts to the editors or directly to the publisher.

The thematical focus of this two-part volume, resulting from an international, interdisciplinary and interreligious conference at Frankfurt's Goethe University, is on questions regarding the nature, history, function(s) and rationality of prophecy within the three Abrahamic religions. The first part comprises a series of historical case studies tracing the history of the idea from the Ancient Near East through Judaism, Christianity, and Islam in Antiquity, the Middle Ages, the early modern period, and the Enlightenment to the present. The second – again taking into account all three religions – contains a number of studies on exemplary, systematic-theological and/or -philosophical issues, such as prophecy and rationality, prophecy and foreknowledge, prophecy and miracles, and prophecy and revelation.
