

Rechtstheorie - Legal Theory

Edited by Thomas Gutmann, Tatjana Hörnle, and Matthias Jestaedt

This new series collects innovative contributions on the “grammar” of the law. The mounting complexity and pluralisation of legal orders on the one hand and their increasing interactions and dependencies on the other mean that fundamental knowledge of functional law is of ever greater importance.

Islamic law is rarely considered particularly systematic or coherent. However, an analysis of the development of the Islamic notions of equity (istihsān, sometimes also translated as »juristic preference« or »favourable construction«) between the second/eighth and the eighth/fourteenth centuries proves this presumption wrong. During this time period, istihsān was a driving force with regard to the systematisation of Islamic law. This serves as an example of the profound structural transformation Islamic legal theory underwent in its post-formative stage. Simultaneously, a teleological notion of natural law in an Aristotelian tradition comes to the fore. It is based on the presumption that law is coherent – that equal things are treated equally while unequal things are treated unequally.

Just what is a right? Jakob Weissingner approaches this central problem of jurisprudence by critically examining the purpose of such normative concepts and carefully analysing the fundamental elements of normative practice like actions, decisions, the logic of norms and values as well as the plurality of normative practice. Interlinking the insights won, he outlines a stand-alone theory of rights which emphasises the empowering dimension of rights in the process of justifying (legal) rules. Not only does he question well-established theories, such as Hohfeld's famous analysis of legal conceptions, but aspires to set future debates in legal theory, especially those surrounding rights such as the long-standing dispute between interest and choice theories of rights, on new and more solid meta-theoretical ground.
